The long term clinical outcome for children with leukaemia is determined by a number of factors, including the response to treatment and the number of potential curable chromosomal abnormalities that can be identified at diagnosis. The aim of this study was to establish the frequency and significance of these abnormalities in childhood acute myeloid leukaemia (AML). Using the Oxford LRF as a data source, 287 cases of childhood AML were reviewed. Cytogenetic data were available in 188 cases. Of these, 112 (59%) had normal cytogenetic findings and 72 (41%) had a clonal abnormality defined by a consistent clonal marker or structural abnormality. There was no association between the type of clonal abnormality and survival ( $p=0.8$ ). The overall outcome of children with normal cytogenetics was very good with eight relapses (7%) and one death (0.3%) during follow-up. Children with a clonal abnormality had significantly worse outcome with 42 relapses (59%) and 14 deaths (19%) during follow-up ( $p=0.03$ ). The frequency of adverse cytogenetic findings was higher in patients who failed to achieve complete remission. A great deal of research and development has been focused on the task of identifying characteristics associated with a particular individual. Presently, systems and methods exist that can measure and record some personal characteristics of an individual including, for example, blood pressure, pulse rate and body temperature. However, systems currently available are typically expensive, and require a technical level that, while accessible to many people, is often unattainable for many individuals. For example, in many systems it is necessary for the individual to have an active electric connection to his or her body 1cdb36666d
